Farmington opened to the public as a historic home in 1959
The Historical Significance of Farmington

Farmington was not only the home of one of Kentucky’s oldest and most prestigious families, but its main house remains a handsomely preserved example of the Federal style of architecture preferred among wealthy early nineteenth century pioneers on the Kentucky frontier. Farmington was also a thriving hemp plantation – a fact that required a large labor force - and, at the time of John Speed’s death, at least fifty-seven enslaved Blacks also lived at Farmington. It’s also where a young Abraham Lincoln paid a visit to his best friend Joshua Fry Speed for three weeks in 1841; an experience that stayed with him years later as he struggled with how to preserve the Union and heal the differences of a nation.

The Speeds and Frys had important connections to prominent families in Virginia including the family of Thomas Jefferson. Lucy Fry’s great-grandfather, Joshua Fry, surveyed and drew maps with Thomas’ father, Peter Jefferson, and also served as Thomas Jefferson’s tutor. When Peter died, Lucy Gilmer Fry’s maternal grandfather, Dr. Thomas Walker, became one of Thomas Jefferson’s legal guardians.

Construction of the Speeds’ brick residence began in 1815. The house is identified in the original building contract as the design of Paul Skidmore but was clearly influenced by the architectural designs of Thomas Jefferson and probably the wishes of Lucy Speed. In 1806, Lucy had travelled to Charlottesville, VA and had visited the home of her uncle and aunt, whose house, had an octagonal addition designed by Jefferson. Farmington’s plan, with its two octagonal rooms imbedded in the center of the house, is even more comparable to an existing plan by Jefferson for an unidentified residence.

Historians agree that production of hemp in Kentucky necessitated the large labor force that slavery ensured. John Speed had one of the largest slaveholdings in Jefferson County and his enslaved Black workers were an integral part of life at Farmington during the Speeds’ entire fifty-plus years on the property. Along with local craftsmen, enslaved Blacks almost certainly had a big hand in building Farmington.

Farmington was the first Kentucky historic property to tell the full story of its enslaved inhabitants and it has been an interpretive priority of ours since the 1990’s. We are fortunate to have writings from the Speed family about several of their favored enslaved as well as firsthand documentation from former enslaved Farmington residents and their descendants, some of whom continue to volunteer with our staff today to aid our efforts.

Farmington’s best-known guest was Joshua Fry Speed’s close friend, Abraham Lincoln. The life-long friendship between Abraham Lincoln and Joshua Speed transcended differences that divided the nation. The Great Emancipator valued the counsel of his pro-Union, slaveholding friend so much that Speed became Lincoln’s unofficial advisor on Kentucky during the Civil War, and his brother, James Speed, became Lincoln’s Attorney General. Lincoln noted in a letter to Joshua, 20 years later, that an experience with slavery while on his trip to Kentucky remains “a site that torments me every time I see a border like the Ohio.”

Farmington’s story deserves to be lifted up, its full history preserved, learned, and shared with new generations. We plan to do more than just restore and preserve the structures on the property, but to create infrastructure for robust educational programming as well. At Farmington, we preserve a quintessential experience of what life was like in early nineteenth century Kentucky. We recreate many aspects of a working hemp plantation, a self-sufficient farm, and a slice of life where future leaders of our community, our state, and even our nation once stayed. In a world where experiences are fleeting or virtual, we supply a hands-on education of a period in time. That is a value to all of society. We hope that you will join us as we continue to preserve Farmington for generations to come.
